Pam Diedrich is a partner in the Medical Malpractice Practice Group at Goodell DeVries, where she represents healthcare providers and organizations in complex medical malpractice litigation, credentialing matters, and privacy breach issues. She is known for her zealous advocacy and unwavering commitment to protecting her clients' interests in high-stakes matters, and for her hands-on approach to litigation from inception through resolution.

With more than 25 years of experience, Pam has built a distinguished practice focused on catastrophic injury litigation. Her work spans medical malpractice, personal injury, toxic tort, premises liability, and product liability matters. She is deeply involved in every phase of her cases, allowing her to develop effective strategies tailored to each client's objectives. She has successfully represented clients in state and federal courts, class actions, and mass tort proceedings, as well as before licensing boards and administrative tribunals. Her breadth of experience allows her to provide strategic, practical counsel across all phases of litigation. Pam approaches every matter with strategic rigor and a results-driven mindset, earning the trust of clients facing complex and often career-defining challenges.

Prior to joining Goodell DeVries, Pam served as a director at a Washington, D.C.-based law firm and was a key member of its health law practice. In that role, she advised healthcare clients on complex litigation, regulatory compliance, and risk management matters, further solidifying her reputation as a trusted advocate and counselor to healthcare organizations and professionals.

Pam is actively engaged in legal education and mentorship initiatives, reflecting her dedication to the profession and to developing future leaders in the law. She is also involved in various community organizations and serves on the board of The Talent Machine Company, a nonprofit children's theatre organization.
